

I think many people hope that this latest round of reactions regarding race, actually brings more change than past riots, changes in laws, statue issues, confederate flags and so on. Incremental change is always good, but on some issues, never enough. Racism shows up in big and small ways. Often it's subtle, and so easy to go along to get along.

Another personal story. Rose and I lost interest in pastoring a Mennonite Church, for a variety of reasons, but a big one was, a neighbor of the church had a large confederate flag flying, covering at least 1/3 of their porch. My memory is it was a nazi flag. But regardless, we immediately did not want our children, who were young – exposed to either of these two ideologies. Even without the other issues we discovered at this church, in a pre-candidating visit with the church leaders, this was a deal breaker. Maybe we simply lacked courage.

At times I wonder what my life would be like if we had pastored that congregation. And of course looking back, despite God clearly leading us and blessing us, I wonder some, should we have gone there? I knew then and know now that we were not equipped to take on the racism battle. We would have had a major learning curve, in pastoring a congregation whose leaders, quickly and lightly dismissed that neighbor's flag, and changed the subject. So I hope this article helps us, as do all the reflections to not just learn but also do some self reflection on our own attitudes as well as listen what pops out of our mouths. And it's wonderful to see some movement in changing habits and attitudes.

White Americans say they are waking up to racism. What will it add up to?

June 22, 2020

By Amy Harmon and Audra D. S. Burch

The New York Times

One recent afternoon, while washing his car, Greg Reese, a white stay-at-home dad in Campton, Kentucky, peeled off the Confederate flag magnet he had placed on its trunk six years earlier. He did not put it back on.

It was a small act for which he expected no accolades. It should not have taken the police killing of George Floyd, Reese knew, to face what he had long known to be true, that the flag he had grown up thinking of as “a beautiful trophy” was “a symbol of hate, and it's obviously wrong to glorify it.”

The sustained outcry over Floyd's death has compelled many white Americans to acknowledge the anti-Black racism that is prevalent in the United States — and to perhaps even examine their own culpability for it. It is as if the ability of white people to collectively ignore the everyday experience of Black people has been short-circuited, at least for now.

Large numbers of white Americans have attended racial justice demonstrations, purchased books about racial inequality and registered for webinars on how to raise children who are anti-racist. Some have asked themselves pointed questions, like how much professional advantage they have garnered from being white and whether they would willingly cede it if they could. Others are going to tattoo parlors to cover up images of Confederate flags, swastikas and Ku Klux Klan symbols on their bodies.

It is hard to know how deep or wide these responses run — and whether they are the result of pressure from peers to appear tolerant or if meaningful action will follow. Anti-racism activists have specified concerns that are not about only symbols or slurs but entire systems governing how Americans live.

Some of the same communities where white liberals have been marching with Black Lives Matter signs have seen steep resistance to efforts to integrate public schools and neighborhoods. And what some consider a profound questioning of white supremacy to others can seem laughably little and unconscionably late. The most frustrating thing about this moment, said Jeremy O. Harris, a playwright and the writer of “Slave Play,” is “listening to white people say this is the first time they realize how bad it is.”

In interviews, some white Americans admitted that even the process of reflecting on racism underscored for them how little they grasp the everyday experience of being Black in America.

Research shows there is scant interpersonal contact between white and Black Americans: 1 in 5 white respondents to a poll from the Public Religion Research Institute last year said that they rarely or ever had an interaction with someone of a different race. In a 2013 study by the same group, a nonpartisan nonprofit, respondents were asked to identify the race of as many as seven people with whom they had discussed important matters in the six months before the survey. Among white respondents, 75% named only white individuals as their core friendship network.

“Many white Americans have chosen places to live, places to send their children to school, places to vacation, jobs to pursue, in ways that allow them to avoid thinking about racial inequality,” said Jennifer Chudy, a political scientist at Wellesley College. Her research suggests that only 1 in 5 white Americans consistently express high levels of sympathy about racial discrimination against Black Americans.

The combination of the coronavirus pandemic, economic collapse and a bungled emergency response by the Trump administration indirectly laid the foundation for the furor among white Americans that followed the cellphone video of Floyd’s death.

“All of that, I believe, is converging at this point to make people, white people in particular, think through America,” said Carol Anderson, author of “White Rage: The Unspoken Truth of Our Racial Divide” and a professor of African American studies at Emory University. “What kind of nation is this, that can be comfortable with a police officer kneeling on someone’s neck for eight minutes and 46 seconds? And when you start asking that question, then all of the kinds of narratives and shibboleths begin to quake.”

It was the words of Floyd’s daughter, Reese said, that propelled him to join activist group Southern Crossroads and create a “Rednecks for Black Lives” decal that he hopes will appeal to politically conservative friends and neighbors. The group’s leaders say that majority-white, working-class communities like Reese’s stand to benefit themselves from forming multiracial alliances.

“The one thing that flipped me and made me really want to do something was when that baby said that her daddy changed the world,” said Reese, referring to comments by Floyd’s 6-year-old daughter, Gianna. “And I want to make that true. I want that baby’s words to come true.”

A shift in the priorities of white Americans regarding racial equality, race scholars said, is critical to achieving it. In the first two weeks of coast-to-coast protests, support for Black Lives Matter increased by nearly as much as it had the previous two years, according to Civiqs, an online research firm. Just over half of American voters support the movement, and in dozens of towns that held protests, the population was almost exclusively white.

“This is the first time that I think a lot of us have felt that the battle is legitimately joined,” author Ta-Nehisi Coates said on “The Ezra Klein Show” last week. Significant swathes of people in non-Black communities, Coates said, have come to perceive something of the deep pain and suffering experienced by Black Americans. “I think that’s different.”

“This is the first time that I think a lot of us have felt that the battle is legitimately joined.” — author Ta-Nehisi Coates

One source of angst for white Americans who say they want to dismantle racism, though, is not knowing precisely where to start. They worry about sounding racist and not sounding sufficiently anti-racist. Some have made misguided offers of cash to Black acquaintances who feel condescended to. Others have formed anti-racist study groups with other white people — but worry that those, too, are lacking.

“I’ll be thinking, ‘Constantly acknowledging racism right now, it’s so draining,’ ” said Erin Lunsford, 29, of Richmond, Virginia, who has engaged in dozens of conversations regarding defunding the police, a popular policy proposal among anti-racism activists that she initially rejected. “And then I’m like, ‘Imagine being a Black person doing that your whole life.’ ”

In the month since Floyd’s death, a museum on the courthouse square in Sumner, Mississippi, dedicated to Emmett Till, whose horrific 1955 murder helped galvanize the civil rights movement, has received 10 times the usual number of calls. Patrick Weems, executive director of the Emmett Till Memorial Commission — which founded the museum — said the callers were white Americans wanting to contribute to preservation projects or help develop curriculum. Dozens more downloaded a smartphone app that guides users on a virtual tour of civil rights history.

Since the first week of protests, Akbar Watson, owner of a Black bookstore in Boynton Beach, Florida, has been slammed with book sales and requests from customers as far away as California and Maine. One day, he said, he sold 40 books before lunch. Another day, a woman in Ohio purchased 34 Black children’s books for her daughter’s school classroom. And for the first time in his 28 years in business, he has sold out of his titles about racial inequalities.

“These are white Americans who are calling and ordering books to try to educate themselves and to try to figure out what to do as a response to what is happening,” said Watson, 60, owner of Pyramid Books, who spent Saturday hand-delivering books in Palm Beach County.

Matt Bartley, a tattoo artist in Pikeville, Kentucky, has fielded more than 20 requests to cover up racist tattoos since he began offering the service for free after Floyd’s death. One client as a teenager had the words “Mein Kampf” tattooed on him by his father, Bartley said. Similar services are being performed by tattoo artists in Dallas; Murray, Kentucky; Charlottesville, Virginia; and Maryville and Nashville, Tennessee.

Among Bartley’s clients was Kyle Kessler, a 29-year-old who had a Confederate flag tattoo covered last week. Kessler said he never saw the Confederate flag as a racist symbol, until recently. He got the tattoo when he was 18, in tribute to one of his favorite bands.

But in conversations with his wife and sister about Floyd’s death, he began to wonder what effect the flag has on Black Americans. He also wondered what the repercussions could be for his 3-month-old son and whether he would be setting the wrong example.

“With everything going on, he’s going to be taught that’s racist, which I now know it is,” Kessler said. “I didn’t want him thinking, ‘Daddy’s got that, and it’s racist, so it’s OK to be racist.’ ”

Kessler said Floyd's death, and the protests that followed, have made him think differently about the Black Lives Matter movement. Now, Kessler said he appreciates that people are standing up for themselves and their right to equality. His new tattoo — the same guitar but without the Confederate banner — reflects that changing perspective.

In Somerset, a small town in southwestern Pennsylvania, Cindy Kinsella, 61, said she knows far more police officers than Black people — her brother is a state police officer in Maryland, and she knows plenty of corrections officers.

She was not sure what to make of the protests when her son told her that he was helping to plan a demonstration. She wished him luck. Then she thought a little more about it.

“I got off the phone and thought, ‘You know what? I’m going to take my grandson, who is 12, and we’re going down,’ ” she recalled. “Just because I thought we could educate ourselves a bit.”

They went to the rally and though they did not march, they watched and listened to the speakers. It was peaceful, nothing like some of the violent protests she had seen in photographs and videos.

It is unclear what he got out of it. But she said she changed her thinking on some things. For example, the phrase Black Lives Matter. “Before,” she said, “I thought, ‘Why do we have to say Black lives matter? Because all lives matter, police lives matter, white lives matter.’ But as they explained a little bit, ‘We’re not saying all lives don’t matter. It’s that all lives can’t matter until Black lives matter.’ ”

Anti-Racism Resources

In this time of overt racial tensions (in the US ... and in Canada ... and confessionally, in ourselves), we humbly offer these resources – biographies, group studies, worship services, biblical retellings – to inspire us toward true reconciliation and love of neighbour.

- Trouble I've Seen: Changing the Way the Church Views Racism by Drew G.I. Hart
- White Fragility: Why it's so Hard for White People to Talk about Racism by Robin J. DiAngelo
- Dear Church: A Love Letter from a Black Preacher to the Whitest Denomination in the U.S. by Lenny Duncan
- Plantation Jesus: Race, Faith, and a New Way Forward by Skot Welch and Rick Wilson
- Perception: A Photo Series by K.C. Adams and Cathy Mattes
- The Cross and the Lynching Tree by James H. Cone
- Racism and Intolerance by Louise Spilsbury
- Becoming an Ally: Breaking the Cycle of Oppression in People by Anne Bishop

Also see related “Decolonization” resources:

- Decolonizing Evangelicalism by Randy S. Woodley and Bo C. Sanders
- Why Indigenous Sovereignty Should Matter to Christians by Chris Budden
- The Church and Indigenous Peoples in the Americas: In Between Reconciliation and Decolonization Edited by Michel Andraos

- Canada at a Crossroads: Boundaries, Bridges, and Laissez-Faire Racism in Indigenous-Settler Relations